

KRFP Promotes community; works to end isolation

A message from KRFP Station Manager Leigh Robartes

KRFP Community Radio knows social and environmental justice is hard work during good times and bad. When things get tough, progressives shift gears and keep moving. People worked hard during the latest election, and delivered majorities in a number of races where candidates had progressive platforms. Protest, electoral and legal activism are all becoming more mainstream as the federal government makes a hard right shift away from the majority.

KRFP has been delivering important news and information since we signed on during the middle of George W. Bush's administration, and we won't falter during the Trump-era. Also, our music and entertainment shows will also provide an alternative soundtrack to the Trump era—one that celebrates a diversity of tastes—giving people a new level of connectivity during a time when isolation and repression are real possibilities.

In the first part of 2017, KRFP plans to finish fundraising for a new antenna at our transmitter site on Paradise Ridge to bring a full power 1100 watt directional signal into buildings and homes around the Palouse, replacing our current 42 watts. We have already purchased the 3400 dollar transmitter for the project, now we must raise money for the expensive, directional antenna, engineering, surveyors, and tower climbers.

Please donate to our operating fund and our Full Power Campaign and help us promote community and end isolation.
